Procedure	Through purposive sampling 15 married couple, between 25-50 years of age with their children who have attended the Out-Patient Department of Institute of Psychiatry, Kolkata were included in the study. A person who has an acute psychiatric illness, any disability, chronic or neurological illness in the family and those who had more than 2 children were excluded from the study. After recruiting families, consent was obtained and pre and post-assessment were done after the stipulated number of therapy sessions.
Data Analysis	Descriptive statistics and Wilcoxon signed-rank test were used for statistical analysis.
Results	The findings reveal that the eclectic family therapy approach significantly improves the level of communication and overall family relationships between family members. This study highlights the impact of communication on family relationships in terms of cohesion, expressiveness and conflict resolution through the practical implications of family therapy, which has proven to be very effective.
Discussion	In the Indian context, the family is described as a social institution with responsibilities for child rearing, child development, emotional and economic support of family members. After becoming parents, both partners often focus on their parental roles and as a result forget about them the effort it takes to put into other relationships including their marriage.
